

name: _____

class: _____

date: _____

Artistic Fusion in Colonial America

In Colonial America, the _____ between Native Americans and European settlers led to a unique blend in art. Native American _____ like pottery, jewelry, and textiles deeply influenced colonial art styles. These indigenous _____ were not only practical but also rich in symbolism and beauty. European settlers were fascinated by the intricate designs and vibrant _____ of Native American art. This fascination was evident in the way colonists began to incorporate similar styles into their own _____. For instance, the _____ made by settlers started to feature patterns and motifs inspired by Native American designs. Native American _____ often used natural materials, which inspired colonial artists to do the same. Materials like feathers, _____, and leather were commonly used in Native American art. Colonists started to use these materials in their _____, home decorations, and other forms of art. The blending of these art forms was not just in materials but also in _____. For example, the weaving techniques of Native Americans influenced colonial textile _____. This cultural exchange was not one-sided. Native Americans also adopted some European _____ and materials. Metal tools acquired from Europeans allowed Native American artists to work with new materials and _____ their traditional crafts. This exchange led to an enriched artistic environment in colonial America. Colonial American art, therefore, was a mixture of European and Native American _____. It represented a melting pot of cultures, showcasing how art can bridge _____ and bring people together. This period in art history highlights the importance of openness and _____ for other cultures, something that is still relevant today.

beads

differences

enhance

colors

production

creations

appreciation

influences

techniques

quilts

clothing

crafts

methods

interaction

artifacts

artists