

name: _____

class: _____

date: _____

Craftswomen in Medieval Times

In medieval England, the role of women was often dictated by social _____ and expectations. Despite this, many women found their niche in the world of _____. They engaged in various trades such as weaving, pottery, and _____. These activities were not only a means of contributing to the family's _____ but also a form of artistic expression.

One common craft among women was _____. Using a loom, women would create textiles for their household or for sale at local markets. This skill was passed down from _____ to daughter, ensuring that the tradition survived through generations.

Another popular activity was _____, which involved shaping clay into useful and decorative items. Women _____ played a crucial role in supplying households with essential items like pots and plates.

_____ was another area where women excelled. They decorated garments with intricate designs that often told _____ or represented familial symbols. This craft was highly valued and the products could be sold for a good _____, providing an important income source for many families. In some cases, women who mastered these _____ gained considerable respect and autonomy compared to other women of their time.

Despite their contributions, the _____ of these craftswomen was often undervalued in historical records. It is important to recognize and appreciate the _____ and creativity of these women, who played a significant role in the economic and cultural life of medieval England. Their _____ continues to influence craft traditions to this day.

Women in crafts were also vital in teaching and preserving these _____. They not only created goods but also ensured that their knowledge was not lost. This educational role was crucial for the _____ of craft techniques and designs throughout the centuries in medieval England.

legacy price survival work potters skills Embroidery embroidery traditions stories crafts weaving mother pottery income norms crafts