

name: class: date:

Daily Life in the Age of Sensibility

In the Age of Sensibility, people valued deep _____ and personal connections, making domestic life very significant. Families spent a lot of time together in their _____, sharing stories and engaging in intellectual discussions. The drawing room was often the heart of the house, where guests were entertained with music, poetry, and lively _____. Women played a key role in managing the household and nurturing these _____, although their contributions were often undervalued by society. Education was considered important, and many parents, especially in the middle and upper classes, took an active role in their children's _____. Books were treasured items, providing both knowledge and _____. In this era, letter-writing was a popular form of communication, connecting people across long _____ with heartfelt words. Meals were more than just a time to eat; they were an opportunity for family members to gather and share their day's _____. Handmade crafts and artworks decorated the home, reflecting the family's _____ and interests. Gardens also played a crucial role, not just for their beauty, but as sources of food and medicinal _____. Despite the emphasis on sentiment and connection, social and gender _____ persisted, shaping every aspect of domestic life. Nonetheless, the Age of Sensibility fostered a culture that deeply appreciated the beauty and depth of everyday _____.