

name: class: date:

Georgian Architecture and Brickwork

In the 18th century, Georgian architecture became popular in _____ . This style is known for its symmetry and proportion. Houses were often built with _____ , which were considered a sign of wealth. The _____ of Georgian homes were tall and narrow, letting in plenty of light. A typical feature was the _____ , often surrounded by decorative columns. Inside, the _____ were a central element, often elaborately designed. The _____ of these buildings were usually steep and sometimes hidden behind a parapet. In terms of _____ , red and brown bricks were most common. Some houses had _____ facades, which were painted in bright colors. The _____ and other decorative elements were often white, contrasting with the brickwork. Georgian towns like _____ became famous for their uniform architectural style. Gardens in this period were formal and complemented the house's _____ . Architects like _____ became famous for their Georgian designs. This style was not just limited to England, but also influenced buildings in the _____ . Georgian architecture represents a period of elegance and _____ , deeply influencing modern architectural trends.

John Nash

United States

stucco

symmetry

door

roofs

color

bricks

windows

architecture

cornices

Bath

England

fireplaces