

name: _____

class: _____

date: _____

Ship Burials in Anglo-Saxon Art

The Anglo-Saxons, a group of _____ that settled in England, had unique burial customs. Among these, the ship burial stands out as a fascinating practice. This _____ involved placing the deceased in a boat, surrounded by various goods. In these burials, the ship symbolized a vessel for the _____ to the afterlife. The most famous example is the Sutton Hoo burial in _____. Discovered in 1939, this site revealed a wealth of _____, shedding light on Anglo-Saxon life and culture.

The buried individual was often a _____ or a person of high status. Around them, one would find weapons, _____, and everyday items, indicating their wealth and social position. These objects also had symbolic meanings, reflecting the beliefs and _____ of the society. The Anglo-Saxons believed in an afterlife, where the _____ continued its existence. The goods buried with the deceased were thought to be useful in the next world.

Artistically, these _____ provide a glimpse into the exquisite craftsmanship of the time. The Sutton Hoo helmet, for instance, is a remarkable piece of _____. Its intricate design and detailed decoration showcase the skill and _____ of Anglo-Saxon artisans. Other items like _____, bowls, and even musical instruments have been found, illustrating a rich cultural life.

The discovery of these ship burials has greatly contributed to our understanding of the _____. It shows their artistic abilities, their social structures, and their spiritual _____. For historians and archaeologists, each burial is a treasure trove of information, offering a unique _____ into the past.

England	creativity	jewelry	leader	journey	metalwork	ritual	artifacts
Anglo-Saxons	beliefs	soul	tribes	window	values	coins	graves