

name: _____

class: _____

date: _____

The Charm of Georgian Terraced Homes

In the 18th and 19th centuries, a distinctive style of architecture emerged in _____ . This style, known as Georgian architecture, was named after the _____ George I through George IV. Georgian architecture is characterized by its emphasis on _____ and proportion. One of the most iconic examples of this style is the terraced _____. These houses were built in long rows, and each house was connected to its _____ .

A typical Georgian terraced house had a _____ exterior. The front doors were often decorated with ornate _____ and surrounded by _____. Windows played a significant role in Georgian houses. They were typically large, allowing plenty of _____ into the rooms. The windows on the upper floors were often smaller than those on the ground _____ .

Inside, these houses were just as elegant. They often featured a central _____ that was a focal point of the interior design. The rooms were well proportioned, and the ceilings were decorated with intricate _____. Fireplaces were a common feature in almost every room, adding to the _____ and comfort of the home.

The back of the house usually contained a small _____ , which was a luxury in urban areas. These gardens provided a private outdoor space for the residents. Georgian terraced houses were not just homes; they represented a _____ of elegance and _____. Today, many of these houses are still standing and are sought after for their historical _____ and architectural beauty. They remind us of a bygone era and continue to be a significant part of _____ landscapes in Britain.

canopies

lifestyle

symmetry

symmetry

Britain

urban

garden

warmth

light

floor

house

plasterwork

charm

kings

columns

staircase

neighbors

brick