The Treaty of Troyes and the Hundred Years' War

In the midst of the Hundred Years' War, a significant _____ unfolded that would alter the course of history between England and France. This event was the signing of the _____ of Troyes in 1420. The treaty declared King Henry V of England as the heir to the French throne, bypassing the rightful heir, _____, the Dauphin of France. This decision was made possible through the alliance between Henry V and the _____ Queen Isabeau, who was estranged from her son, Charles. According to the treaty, Henry V married _____, Isabeau's daughter, strengthening the bond between England and a faction of French _____.

The impact of the treaty was profound. It effectively disinherited Charles and recognized Henry V and his _____ as the legitimate rulers of France. This was a controversial move that deepened the _____ within France. Some regions, particularly those loyal to Charles, resisted the English and their _____, leading to further conflicts. The treaty, however, was short-lived in its effectiveness. Henry V died in 1422, followed by the _____ of the mad King Charles VI of France a few months later, leaving their infant son, Henry VI, as king of both _____ and France. This dual monarchy was not sustainable, especially with the _____ of support for Charles, now Charles VII, after the appearance of _____ of Arc.

Joan's victories reinvigorated the French cause, ultimately leading to the reversal of the Treaty of Troyes' _____. The treaty, while initially seeming to secure English dominance in _____, actually sowed the seeds for a renewed French unity and the eventual expulsion of the _____ from French soil. The Treaty of Troyes remains a pivotal, yet controversial, moment in the _____ of the Hundred Years' War, illustrating the complexities of inheritance, allegiance, and the quest for _____ in medieval Europe.
